In a recent survey of more than 500 venture-backed founders, 71% indicated that at least some staffers would be allowed to work from anywhere after their offices reopen.

- 51.3% of Bay Area employees would relocate if they could work remotely.
- During COVID-19 shutdown, 85% of Bay Area employees worked from home.
- 36% of Bay Area people looking elsewhere cited cost as the main reason.

Per a Zillow survey:

31% of people would consider moving in order to live in a home that has a dedicated office space.

Per Redfin:

• 105% increase in page views of small towns (50,000 or less) from last year, an exceptionally higher rate than they were last year.

• 76% increase in page views in rural communities with fewer than 10,000 people.

of newly remote employees expect to continue to work from home.

Work from home removes the traditional barriers typically associated with living away from city core (commute time and cost).

Increasing trends show people moving away from expensive metro areas for less expensive towns where the cost of living is lower.
